Diffuse cutaneous lymphomas (DCLs) are a heterogeneous group of non-Hodgkin's lymphomas. These disorders usually present with disseminated lesions, and cases of localized involvement of the skin are rare. The immunophenotype of DCL may be helpful in the differential diagnosis with other B-cell lymphomas, in particular with those involving the skin. An 11-year-old girl presented with a rapidly progressing lymphoproliferative disorder. The skin lesions demonstrated sheets of small lymphocytes with strongly positive staining for CD45, CD20, CD79a, and Ki-B2/DR. In situ hybridization for Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) was performed, and strong expression of the viral encoded RNA was observed in the majority of lymphoid cells. Electron microscopic analysis revealed that the lymphocytes demonstrated a morphologic appearance of lymphoblasts. The monoclonal B-cell receptor (Ig heavy chain gene) rearrangement was also detected. The histologic, immunophenotypic, and molecular findings are consistent with the diagnosis of DCL of the leg. DCL should be included in the differential diagnosis of lymphoproliferative disorders involving the skin. The association with EBV expression confirms the cutaneous infiltration by this B-cell neoplasm.

Risk of venous thromboembolism in gynecologic cancer patients in the Netherlands: a comparison with the general population. The risk of venous thromboembolism (VTE) in cancer patients is still undefined and controversial. The aim of the current study was to assess the risk of VTE among gynecologic cancer patients in the Netherlands compared with the general population in the Netherlands. We evaluated the incidence of VTE of gynecologic cancer patients treated in the Netherlands by a population-based cohort study, comparing gynecologic cancer patients with the general Dutch population. From February 2004 to March 2006, we collected data from the Comprehensive Cancer Registry of the Netherlands (ZCOG) and the Netherlands Cancer Registry (NKC) from all gynec

this article is to report the case of a recurrent ameloblastoma with no sign of recurrence for 17 months, in a 19-year-old girl without a history of trauma. The lesion was diagnosed histopathologically and immunohistochemically, using the monoclonal antibodies AE1/AE3, CAM 5.2 and BER-Ep4. The results showed a positive reaction for epithelial membrane antigen and cytokeratin antibodies. These histopathological and immunohistochemical markers of malignancy in ameloblastomas have been described previously. Supreme Court nominee Brett Kavanaugh has declined to answer questions about the high school yearbook he wrote in which he called himself "Bart O'Kavanaugh" and one classmate the "devil's spawn." "I prefer to work through my background and answer questions directly," Kavanaugh told Sen. Orrin Hatch. Orrin Grant Hatch Bottom line Bottom line Senate GOP divided over whether they'd fill Supreme Court vacancy MORE (R-Utah) in a July 19 phone interview with The Salt Lake Tribune, which was published Tuesday. He also has dodged questions about several sexual assaults in which he was accused, including an incident where he and his friend Mark Judge had forced his then-girlfriend, Deborah Ramirez, to perform a sex act on him when they were high school students. ADVERTISEMENT Kavanaugh's yearbook entry, his first public comments on the accusations, along with his high school yearbook quote and alleged misconduct from his days in high school have dominated media coverage of the nomination process for the Supreme Court, which Kavanaugh currently is overseeing. But Hatch said he wanted to give Kavanaugh a chance to explain himself. "I think he needs to tell his side of the story, and I wanted to give him a chance to tell his side of the story," the senator said. "I'm going to give him the opportunity to do that." Hatch also noted his intention to grill Kavanaugh on the allegations he faced in high school. d0c515b9f4
