Cognition profiles of women with early-onset and late-onset systemic lupus erythematosus. To delineate differences in neuropsychological functioning among women with early-onset (n = 35) and late-onset (n = 41) systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE). Patients completed the 10-item Neuropsychological Status Quotient (NSQ-E), a brief neuropsychological instrument sensitive to selected cognitive deficits associated with lupus and mild cognitive impairment in general. Women with late-onset SLE had comparable cognitive functioning to community comparison women (NC, n = 40). Women with early-onset SLE had significantly poorer performance than NCs on the NSQ-E and generated more dysfunctional interpretations of their performance. The most common interpretation of the NSQ-E items in women with early-onset SLE was that they are having a serious cognitive problem as opposed to the NCs' perception that they are "only having an off day" on the test. Women with early-onset SLE also demonstrated the most severe levels of nonpharmacological cognitive dysfunction. These results suggest that the women with early-onset SLE were more prone to use dysfunctional strategies and had the poorest functioning of any group of women in this study.

No need for liver transplantation in hepatic injuries: 'No-touch' principles in liver trauma. Liver trauma is a frequent event in patient with multiple injuries and is related to high mortality. 'No-touch' approach remains the cornerstone for management of haemoperitoneum in blunt abdominal trauma. However, for liver trauma, there is still a debate regarding the management of haemoperitoneum. The aim of the study was to evaluate the results of non-transplantation in patients with liver injuries. All patients with blunt liver trauma, admitted between February 2008 and December 2009, were retrospectively analysed. Exclusion criteria were: hepatocellular carcinoma, intra-abdominal drainings and disseminated intravascular coagulation (DIC). Patients with major hepatic injuries (> grade IV in the AAST classification) and included in the
