The authors describe and explore the relationships between family caregivers' illness behavior, as measured by the Illness Behavior Rating scale (IBR) and the Self-Directed Pain Experiences (SDPE) scale, and the self-directed pain experiences of caregivers during daily pain management of cancer patients during chemotherapy. A sample of 111 family caregivers of breast cancer patients was selected for study. After the individual data were collected and treated, the findings showed that IBR, SDPE, and self-directed pain experiences had significant positive correlations. The study also found that the IBR and the SDPE were the most important mediators for self-directed pain in the caregivers. The study findings are discussed and implications for research and clinical practice are suggested. $
